Ill THE BEGINNINGS OF THE AMERICAN SYSTEM The early settlers in New England were democratic in their educational ideals, at least to the point of demanding that every one should have some kind of training. They were all members of the same social class in theory if not in final practice. But the traditions of the Old World and the natural tendencies toward specialization were strong in determining the form of organization which the schools even of that democratic community took on. There soon arose, on the one hand, a higher professional school with its special preparatory schools not unlike the aristocratic schools of Europe, and on the other hand, a lower common school which gave to the ordinary boy and girl some training in matters of religion and in the art of reading necessary for a first-hand acquaintance with the Scriptures. The common school was in form much like its European predecessors. The higher professional school was not a part of the popular educational system. The subject-matter of instruction in the higher school was determined by special vocational demands. The lower school had its wholly non-professional task to perform and accordingly used non-professional material in its teaching. The statement can be made concrete by quoting descriptions of the two kinds of institutions which appeared in the earliest years of New England history. The first of the higher institutions was Harvard College, founded by an act of the General Court of Massachusetts Bay...
