CHAPTER V One of the greatest evils of the United States existing prior to the war, but which only attained its monstrous proportions afterward, was the bestowal of practically all the positions and offices under the government to mere politicians as a reward for their equivocal services in the campaign. It was an indirect form of bribery, placing a premium on misrepresentation, fraud and every form of pernicious activity which debased the electoral franchise. The cynical utterance of General Jackson, the great Democratic leader and president before the war, that to the victor belongs the spoils, and the utterance even more cynical of a certain Senator Ingalls, one of the most prominent leaders of the Republican party fifty years later, that purity in politics was an iridescent dream together denote the principle or lack of principle which actuated both parties. The government of a great nation was not regarded as the government of the smallest town, as the conduct of any form of business is, namely that the rulers or managers are trustees for the benefit of those who hold the real interest in such business or government. In the government of the United States men were not appointed to office for their ability, knowledge and integrity, but as a reward for money contributions, or questionable personal services for their party. The duties of the office were regarded as of entirely subsidiary consequence. The emoluments were the indirect form of bribery for...
