Scarcely anything seems to have been omitted which could render the band harmonious and effective; from the martial notes of the great trumpet, to the humble accompaniment of the little castanet, which seems to be designated as a second kind of tzlatzal, or cymbal, the whole repertory is ransacked in order to give additional force to the devout strains of religious melody. To us the passage is interesting, because it shows us that we have a sufficient precedent for the instrumental music which we have introduced into our churches; it shows us that while the words of our service, of prayer and thanksgiving, are supplied by the prophetic muse of the Jewish sanctuary, we have introduced no incongruous elements in the varied notes of the organ, which rolls its majestic volume of sound through the stately aisles of our cathedrals.
