Every sunrise brings a fresh reminder of the sadness deep within your soul, as if the reality of your loss is entering your heart and mind for the very first time. Regrets, questions, doubts, and bittersweet memories seem to well up almost as quickly as your room fills with the morning light. Facing Dawn is a devotional-style journey through the early days of grief with a mom whose heart has been shattered by the deaths of two of her children: once by the loss of her daughter to SIDS, again by the loss of her son to brain cancer. In this book, Tammy writes honestly and transparently about her doubts, questions, and fears in the face of her heartache. If you believe God is good but struggle to understand how in the midst of your own pain, you will find Tammy s words both comforting and inspiring. Tammy writes, In my early grief after losing my daughter, the first hours of every morning were the most difficult part of the day. Morning seemed to whisper cruel thoughts as my chest felt the weight of what my heart could not bear. Adrienne s crib was empty. Dreams were shattered. Family pictures would never be the same. Sunlight seemed to carry with it a darkness no one around me could understand. As I chartered the unfamiliar waters of grief, dawn assaulted me with the most brutal waves of sadness. I learned a lot in my grief as a young mom. I learned that no one can walk with you through the darkness of a broken heart. Friends tried. They invited...
