In stony mountain regions their houses were made of stone; in the more fertile plains they utilized sun-baked mud reinforced with straw and twigs rammed into movable forms of wicker, sticks and poles. The first Americans were, indeed, ahead of us in making use of the principles of what we now call reinforced concrete construction. Their methods, to be sure, were crude and their materials defective, but the essentials of our up-to-date twentieth century constructions were known to this aboriginal people many centuries before the existence of America was even suspected in Europe. The Spaniards taught the aborigines to make walls of sun-dried brick, the adobe method of building that is now looked upon as characteristic of Mission architecture in Arizona, California, New Mexico and other neighborhoods Figure 3. Early Eighteenth Century Doorway, The Alamo Mission, Sun Antonio, Texas New Mexico Museum, at Santa Fe. The main entrance to this building, shown in Figure 5, exemplifies the subtle and endless modifications of line and mass so characteristic of aboriginal American art. Wherever one goes in this striking building, facing the centuries old plaza replete with memories, one finds new and picturesque arrangements and incidents of design to excite the imagination. HOW THE MISSIONARIES SIMPLIFIED SPANISH DESIGN IT MAY well be asked what the Franciscan missionaries contributed to the art of the Southwest if they adopted so much from the Pueblo people? For an answer the writer refers again to the splendidly ornamental facade of San...
