Martin Lauzer, Revue de Thgrapeutique, II., p. 68, (1854), takes from the Revue de Therap. du Midi, the following case of poisoning: A sick man had swallowed a teaspoonful of the tincture of Acciite, but, fearing some danger, took immediately after a seidlitz powder. Fifteen minutes after he complained of nausea and gnawing pain in the stomach. He took at once an emetic. The skin was cold, pulse 100, weak, and irregular, there was a cramp-like extension of the fingers; convulsions, lasting but a short time, shook the whole body; intelligence unimpaired. In spite of the employment of internal and external remedies, the patient complained, three hours after, of burning pains in the throat, stomach, belly, and in the small of the back; the pulse was weak,...
